Perhaps there is no point on which amendments to our constitution will be proposed and be so strongly re-sisted as the one altering the basis of representation by making the House of Representatives smaller. The principle was wisely incorporated into the Consti-tution of the General Government, of giving to each State one Representative irrespective of its population. The same principle obtains in giving each town in a State one representative in its Legislature An alteration making the repre-sentative body larger and bringing the delegated power mearer the people would meet with little or no opposition.
